From Carol Cannon

Holiday greetings from Allentown, PA. It's good to be home. I'm enjoying the thrills of single family homeownership – and evolving my home into an even healthier place. One of my goals in house hunting was to find a home with low Alternating-Current Magnetic Fields. This is the portion of electric current that cannot be lowered by anything but distance or shut off. You'd be surprised how many people live in homes with AC magnetic field levels that are too high for good health. This was so critical to me that my gauss meter level was more important than looking at the house. I knew I found the perfect place when my best friend was inside proclaiming, "This is it!" and I was happily looking at a low reading. For a great holiday gift idea, check out two magnetic field meter recommendations from the Institute for Bau-Biologie.

I also located a wood floor refinisher that used a water-based, extremely durable, low-VOC Swedish sealer called Eon 70 by Boma X®. It did a magnificent job on my oak floors. If you are refinishing floors, please ask for an alternative to oil finishes, which have very high VOC's (volatile organic compounds) that can make you sick. Beginning next month, several states are enacting new VOC regulations for air quality. Click here to read more about them. Remember, there are alternatives to almost everything toxic!

Wishing you a happy and healthy holiday season, with peace,

Success Secrets: Feng Shui for Your Business

When designing your workspace, avoid placing offices near high-voltage rooms, copy/fax machines, or computer server rooms. Look for building sites that are not adjacent to power lines or electrical transformers, as these can increase magnetic alternating current and electric fields. It is nearly impossible to eliminate magnetic alternating current because it travels through walls, so the best deterrent is to locate far away from them.

In Living Color: Using the Power of Color for Better Living

^ Top

Dear Readers: This new monthly feature presents a "color of the month" and its Feng Shui interpretation. In honor of the holidays, this month's color is green, which abounds at this time of year.

Green represents the Wood Element in Chinese Five Element Theory. It is a color that inspires growth, creation, family and friends. Bring green into your office to foster creativity and achieve goals. And, since green is also a tranquil color, you can bring it into your bedroom to create a soothing environment that encourages rest.

Corporate Creatives has beautiful Swarovski crystal fan pulls in a variety of colors ... including green! Add a sparkle in your home. Learn more.

4-Pillars Analysis

The gift of a 4-Pillars Analysis has the potential to bring positive, long-term changes to the lives of those you love. Based on the Chinese astrological system known as the Four Pillars, this analysis uses a person's date/time of birth and the city where he or she was born to discover the elements, directions, colors and shapes that support life balance.

New Feng Shui E-Book

^ Top

I'm pleased to announce my inclusion as an author in Master Keys to Success, an ebook collection of articles and advice on how to realize your dreams. The article, Creating Healing Environments with Feng Shui and Bau Biologie, focuses on balancing the principles of these two practices and working through situations where their recommendations conflict. The best news? You can receive a free copy of Master Keys to Success when you order a copy of Fast Feng Shui, a user-friendly feng shui manual by Stephanie Roberts. Learn more.
